For the Bahrain national pavilion at Expo 2015 in Milan, Holtrop designed the building's interior spaces through the lens of courtyard typologies, creating a series of courtyards that work together to provide shade and ventilation. The pavilion's design is a response to the hot climate of Bahrain and the need for a building that can withstand the harsh sun and high temperatures of the region.

FEATURE

Uniquely sculptural and evocative, the extensive body of work by Anne Holtrop has a universal appeal in the worlds of both art and architecture. Holtrop originally trained as an architect at the Academie van Beeldende en Architectuur, but on graduating, in 2005, he decided to eschew the familiar world of Dutch architecture and work for artist Kees de Koning, a former student of Donald Judd's. The experience helped Holtrop develop a highly elevated form of research practice, which manifests itself simultaneously in drawings, painting, sculpture, furniture, and architectural forms. Early installation projects such as the Traf House (completed in 2009, the year he founded his studio) and the Temporary Museum (L'Arte) (2010) have now given way to much larger, more permanent settings: his widely celebrated design for the Bahrain Pavilion at Milan's Expo 2015, for example, is currently being rebuilt as a botanical garden in Bahrain, and his bunker-style underground pavilion for the Fort bij Vechten Waterloonaanpak, near Utrecht, Netherlands, opened to the public earlier this year. Most of Holtrop's work appears to be driven by an intuitive process, and his self-contained aesthetic logic is part of its powerful charm. PIN-UP caught up with the 38-year-old in his native Amsterdam, where he was visiting from his current home in Bahrain before he will be designing at this year's Venice Architecture Biennale, in a conversation as inspired and soaring as his sculptural configurations, we discussed his poetic and singular approach to site, habit, and landscape.

Shami Bose: There is a new vanguard of European and international practitioners, like Office EGGS, Isakoh, Pato von Etzschkau, and poewel. It's not exactly based or ideological, but there seems to be an intangible common aspect between you all.

Anne Holtrop: Yes. You could even add Michael Flanagan, Co Hoogeweg... We all know each other, we're friends. It's not so different from other generations, it's just because of how visible things are, thanks to the internet, that it seems like everything is more connected. But if you had to find a common denominator in all of our work, you could say that the architecture is what prevails above the historic. Most of us are really into making work without other agendas attached to it. There's not so much of a social agenda.

SB: Or an explicitly political one?
AH: Let's say that there's a more pragmatic attitude to space. The Dutch generation before me, for example, was more interested in making extreme situations based on the data-wrapping of space.
